Since the French Revolution, the Lumière Brothers and Louis Daguerre, directors of the Paris Academy of Sciences, have attempted to develop a "photographic representation of the visual appearance of an object" to "represent the object itself" to allow for "painting without paint". The American biologist Charles Jackson used electroencephalography (EEG) to detect the brain waves and muscle movement of a subject in a controlled environment without the subject's awareness of the procedure, and was able to record the individual's personal experience of an intense emotional state such as fear or rage, or physical experience such as the sensation of pain or pleasure. EEG is a technique which has been used since the late 1930s. The technique and its analysis has evolved substantially over the past 60 years, as an alternative to the study of the brain through the use of invasive techniques. Scientific evidence concerning the effectiveness of psychotherapy has been disputed by some scholars, who argue that many of the studies are flawed. Critics of psychotherapy argue that "bad" studies are often published and that good studies are often ignored by the media and the public. The term "evidence-based psychotherapy" has been used to refer to the practice of psychotherapy based on scientific evidence. Evaluation criteria Studies of the effectiveness of psychotherapy tend to be classified into different types and designs. There are methods of study that compare psychotherapy to a placebo, a no-treatment control, or to another form of treatment. However, the reliability of the effect of psychotherapy is generally not a focus of investigation. Instead, there are more questions about the reliability and replicability of the assessment, evaluation, and reporting of results. Placebo A form of psychotherapy called "placebo" psychotherapy involves the administration of a sugar pill that, because of the expectation of improvement, may mimic the effects of a medication or other physical treatment. A number of meta-analyses of the effectiveness of psychotherapy have reported no statistically significant difference in treatment versus a placebo. No treatment A no-treatment control is a comparison group that receives no treatment. In the past, the no-treatment control group was often a wait-list control. With the use of anti-depressants, the no-treatment control group is often a placebo. Recent studies have randomized the no-treatment control to an attention control group. These studies have shown a significant difference between
